Story of my life. I am 51 and I have just discovered Lightroom 5.
I was shooting for almost 40 years exclusively with Canon Digital Rebel XT and Digital Rebel 2000 and I never once used a RAW converter. The only digital that I use now are Canon 5D mkII and Nikon D5100. The new Lightroom is simply stunning and blows away the previous version in terms of speed and apps. The new Lightroom is much faster than Camera RAW, and it uses much less RAM and CPU under heavy workload. I have been using versions 4 and 5 for several years, and I do believe Lightroom 5 is much faster.
In fact it feels almost instant most of the time. It is like a blur except that it still produces a very usable image. The quality of original images is kept better without losing quality sadly. Before I used to have a 6 year old CP+ with 2. I like the ability to assign shortcut keys to work in place of the mouse for editing layers, the ability to select photos for use as RGB or Grayscale colors (and vice versa), and its ability to create new paths for smart object editing. It's a lot of griping to be sure, but Adobe seems to have focused on the addition of these new features, rather than fixing the bugs and improving the performance after all these years. I frequently run into errors and crashes, and Adobe finally responded by putting those features on a "waitlist" to be released with 5.2. But considering that Photoshop currently has bugs, you'd think that Adobe could eliminate or fix these by now. With so many important features on the "waitlist," it'd be nice if Adobe held off on releasing not-yet-bug free Photoshop until they've fixed the remaining bugs. I'm hoping for a bounce-back next year that will include the non-destructive changes finally taking place.
